To review the ability of in vivo confocal microscopy to detect subclinical inflammatory disease in the conjunctiva of patients and to determine whether the number of images captured can affect the interpretation of the findings. Department of Ophthalmology, the Department of Dermatology and the Department of Pathology at the Wilmer Ophthalmological Institute and the Wilmer Ophthalmological Associates. In vivo confocal microscopy was performed on 30 eyes of 15 patients (5 men and 10 women) with a mean age of 32.9 years +/- 16.9 (standard deviation). In the cases in which the previous clinical presentation of disease had not included conjunctival lesions, confocal imaging identified multiple punctate epithelial erosions and linear lesions of the epithelium. In the cases in which the initial clinical presentation had included conjunctival lesions, confocal imaging identified a discrete lesion that appeared to correspond to a papillary conjunctivitis grade 1 lesion. The results of this preliminary study suggest that in vivo confocal microscopy is a promising technique to detect subclinical disease of the conjunctiva. However, a limitation of the technique is the variable size of the images that may be obtained.[Implants in third molar surgery]. The article discusses the indication of implants following tooth extraction. Stable, fixed implant-supported prostheses can be contraindicated due to the significant risk of fracture of the fibro-osseous tissue of the alveolar bone and the implant itself. Modern implant systems offer a stable support for prostheses, however, the use of implants for single tooth replacement is not yet established in clinical practice. The article describes 6a5afdab4c
