For emergency physicians, learning about neuroplasticity helps to explain why people will demonstrate remarkable resilience after a traumatic injury or illness. One example I like to use is my own experience as an EMS lieutenant. As a teenage boy, I would shoot hoops before summer vacation, after a long morning of work, or in the evening before going to bed. I could take a rusty elbow shot to the head, feel no ill effects, and be back at it the next day. The same acuity is observed in many aspects of children's neurodevelopment. Imagine my delight, or that of many others, when I found an article on the subject in the Bulletin of the American Academy of Pediatrics (June 2005, January 2007) indicating that young children with autism and traumatic brain injuries have "increased cerebral volume (greater brain size)." All that to say the brain's ability to adapt to its environment and environment's ability to alter brain function are similar in the short and long run. Take a look at this "neurotrophic factor" experiment conducted by researchers from the University of Illinois and Iowa State University's Department of Pharmacology and Toxicology. It shows the impact of overstimulation on the developing brain: Finding ways to communicate with the brain's ability to respond can help us remain balanced and open to our evolutionary mind. Early child neuroscience research indicates that the human brain develops distinct areas and tasks dependent on its environment. Thus, early stimulation-based environments seem to direct eye gaze to preferred stimuli. Our mission is to empower the next generation of healthcare professionals by providing the best available evidence-based information to advance EMS through well-intentioned online discussion and volunteer-based editing.
