Physicians rely on clinical examination, spirometry, and peak flow to detect asthma. Our purpose was to compare the agreement between these three tests for detecting asthma. We performed a cross-sectional survey of 654 children from two elementary schools in Northern California and Southern New Mexico who had self-reported bronchodilator use. Physicians evaluated patients' physical examination, spirometry, and peak flow values. Asthma was diagnosed by spirometry and/or by a physician in the past. Sensitivity was defined as the percentage of patients with asthma who had a positive test result. Agreement was measured as the kappa value of agreement. There was 95.8% sensitivity and 93.6% agreement for the combination of physical examination and peak flow. The sensitivity and agreement of spirometry and peak flow were 95.3% and 98.8%, and for peak flow alone, 99.3% and 96.8%, respectively. For children with a positive clinical examination, more lung function tests were needed than for those with a negative exam (P
