The effect of a modified radiation dose for breast cancer on serum immunoglobulins and immune function was examined. Twenty-four women with locally advanced breast cancer (20 with involvement of the axillary nodes and 4 without) received a reduced radiation dose of 40 Gy and intravenous chemotherapy consisting of cyclophosphamide, doxorubicin, and fluorouracil given during the course of radiotherapy. Serum levels of immunoglobulins were measured before and at regular intervals after therapy. Patients were divided into two groups: 10 with adequate radiotherapy (Group 1) and 14 with severely reduced radiotherapy (Group 2). Patients in Group 2 had a lower (P less than.005) or normal IgG value (Groups 1 and 2, respectively) after the reduced radiation dose. Reducing the radiation dose resulted in a transient decrease in IgG antibody response to tetanus toxoid (P less than.025) and a decrease in the number of T cells that responded to phytohemagglutinin (P less than.005). There was a significant correlation between serum immunoglobulin levels and immune function as measured by the percent of cells from peripheral blood lymphocyte suspensions reacting to phytohemagglutinin (P less than.005) and with the percent of tetanus-specific antibody producing cells (P less than.025). Patients with low levels of IgG appeared to respond to salvage therapy more slowly than patients with normal IgG levels. The interaction between impaired radiotherapy and chemotherapy was not quantified. These results suggest that patients who receive radiotherapy with a reduced dose should be monitored
