The Power of Inclusion: Increasing the Power of the Design Process In the pathfinding of the design process, one of the major obstacles is missing humanism in design. As a result, much of the design process occurs with a procedural model that we have become comfortable with. As a result, each new design iteration is a formulaic endeavor with little ability to change. This system of design may work for some situations, but it is certainly not design led. It is not design aligned. Design with a human heart... To design with a human heart... is to begin a pursuit of solving problems that no one has yet thought to solve, and to treat the client's wishes, desires, and goals as a priority. Design in its core is about solving problems, and thus, we would be remiss to lose sight of this fundamental aspect of the process. Design with a human heart... is to model the client's needs, dreams, desires, and aspirations as an integral component of the design process. And like Einstein's theory of relativity, which subverts our concept of time and space, we do not have to accept design as something that occurs with procedure. We need to reevaluate the design process, and our starting point may be the concept of an epiphany or creative breakthrough in order to strike a chord of approval with clients. Patients were considered eligible for analysis only if chemotherapy was delivered at least 7 weeks prior to radiotherapy. The combination was associated with a significant overall survival advantage (P less than 0.001) and improved disease-free interval 0cc13bf012
