I took a look at the main factors affecting the screen, and we'd like to show you the most important. In this section, we discuss advantages and disadvantages of different screen technologies. Screen technologies The first thing we need to know how your particular screen is made. There are seven basic technologies to choose from: LCD LCD stands for flat. It is the cheapest type of flat screen. It is also the first type of screen used to make large displays, as you can see in the first image. Transistor Trinitron Technion LCD Technicolor They are also the most common screens in the world. The TFT LCD TV itself is quite bulky. And because you need a powerful external source of light, they're best used in the living room. They are usually controlled by a proprietary cable box or device that controls all the content and TVs that receives it. The picture is generated by individual small crystals that are wired to each pixel in the screen. They are not the latest technology. They are old and fragile technology. They can be a great option for older TVs or high-end homes, but not for newer TVs.

Projector Projection Technology Laptop and desktop projectors are too small to be used as a television screen. Instead, you use it as a medium for the image source, and then project the image on a screen. You can also project images on walls, but that's a project you can keep to yourself. TV Plasma Thin film TV Plasma is a good technology, but it's too expensive. It has a fan, so it is very inefficient. It has a limited life span, as the phosphor glows blue after a certain amount of time. It's also thick and bulky. The low cost and size is why it is still around, but it's not the most efficient way of displaying HD content. LCD Screen Technology LCD stands for flat screen. LCD is very different from plasma screens because it uses millions of individual pixels which are very easy to understand and a space. Because of this is a very nice technology. It is the cheapest technology used in television today. It is used mostly in the business world and in larger homes. The screen is very simple, but it is very energy efficient. It is the most common screen technology used in business today. LCD technology has a lot of disadvantages. The main one is that once you turn the TV on it is very hard to turn it off. LCD screens tend to
