Last year when I first started truly reviewing Adobe/Wacom's Lightroom, I wondered why they had not included a lens profile capability. After a couple months I had a great answer: as both Adobe and Wacom are photographers themselves, I could see them both being very passionate about their work. That passion and drive must have translated into the products they produce. If that connection between consumer and company could be made in a tangible way, it could be great for both. As it stands, I can't help but feel that Wacom or Adobe could do with an in-house lens profile dev team. Here is one such Photoshop screenshot of an example photo we used in this Photoshop review. We demonstrated how you can easily remove objects with the new content aware fill tool, and how you can also straighten crooked photos.
