Neoplasms of the sympathetic and parasympathetic nervous system (PNS) are rare and often associated with clinical syndromes. Clinically, it is commonly accepted that adrenal medullary tumors are associated with Cushing's syndrome, whereas those in the head and neck are related to the metabolic and secretory profile of the tumor. Here, we report the activation of the vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) pathway in paragangliomas, thus demonstrating that the VEGF pathway is an active player in the tumor biology of these tumors. The VEGF pathway is known to play a role in angiogenesis and lymphangiogenesis, processes that are of importance in the pathogenesis of many malignancies.Risk factors for persistent postpartum depression: a population-based study.
