The Markers feature lets you mark sections of an image where you would like to apply a layer effect such as clone or healing. The best thing I can say in favor of this new feature is that cloning is now faster than before. Cloning used to need to wait until the image was all loaded. Now it starts cloning as soon as the layer is on the canvas. I am sure that the number of layers will not increase much, just like your MP3 collection has not increased by much. Unfortunately, the cloned layer is duplicated, so spot healing is also affected by this change. Perhaps leave it as a wish and hope for future versions. Camera Raw and Photoshop alike are at least slightly less buggy now. One thing I wonder is about the various whole image/layer replacement algorithms. Quicker or slower? I would love to see a longer performance analysis test of the new release. Smaller defects that do not require human intervention (cloning, healing, etc.) should be faster now than ever. With enhancements in some of the cloning algorithms, printing smaller documents (4×6 or 8×10) should also be sped up way more. I still expect that a small bug or two may occur when editing complex images with spot healing or cloning. The important thing is that the user should not be punished for choosing a complex image (perfect for spot healing or cloning) over a simple one (where one would expect a small defect) or vice versa. If I could expect a small speed boost here and there it would probably make a big difference. So, perhaps this new release may feel like a small overall improvement, but it is nonetheless significant. Adobe, if you find some more time to play with this release, I would appreciate it if you would provide us with some performance numbers. This would help Photoshop users understand how the new features affect their hardware. That would be the best Christmas present of all.
